

In order to identify the joints in a bladed-disk, non-classical identification methods need to be adapted because of various issues. An expansion based decoupling method in frequency domain called SEMM decoupling is used to identify one of the blade-root joints. The method does not require direct measurement at the interface. It is shown that the identification performs quite well for in-situ validation.